

Basta!

Enough.

We've tried to fix things by political means.

We've tried with petitions, with open letters, with demonstrations.

We came up with jokes and sketches. We wrote articles, and put stickers over our computer cameras.

We ignored things, or gave up.

"It'll be ok," some people thought.

But it won't be ok. It won't change. It will get worse.

Every day, a new scandal is revealed, a new surveillance module installed, a new law waved through.

Every day our basic right to privacy is eroded a little more.

One day, it finally, finally disappears.

Our mails are read, social connections gathered, search histories stored, phone calls tapped, faces biometrically evaluated. Our health, sexual orientations, financial power and credit worthiness, our secrets... every step, every question, every thought is watched, collected, and potentially used against us.

We're transparent, we've been screened. There are hardly any laws to protect us, and if there are, do we trust them? Do we trust our governments? Do we trust other countries' intelligence agencies? Do we trust our own?

Do we still believe that nothing bad will happen, while piece by piece Orwell's vision of a surveillance state is implemented?

The violation of our privacy happens in stealth. It hurts, but we don't feel it.

We sense it, then repress what we see. Until it is too late.

Enough.

We are the new offensive.

Right here, right now.

From now on anyone can become a member of the p≡p cooperative.

Because together we will win this fight: the defense of our basic rights.

The weapons of our cooperative are:

– the education of all

– the protection of communication, chats, messages

– the protection of our contacts, our calendars, our network connections, and the search engines

– and, finally, this: the reconstruction of the entire Internet.

Simply. Automatically. With mathematical methods.

Consumer organizations and citizen's groups combat surveillance through the legal system. We support this fight; it is vital, but our methods are different. We hack the systems of surveillance with the tools of technology.

For that we must be many: Vast numbers. Billions. Worldwide.

We are taking back the net.

Become a member of p≡p coop. Tell other people. Send them the link to our page. Use our tools – or get active and improve them.

Become a part of our group.

We start now.

Let us say, finally,

Basta!
